The month of November has closed without a clear outcome to the issues that have dominated 2019 outlook. Donald Trump announced the reestablishment of steel and aluminum tariffs in Brazil and Argentina, resuming in the markets the tensions related to the commercial war. In this sense, the markets follow the expectation of the possible agreement on December 15, when unless agreed the next round of tariffs between the United States and China will enter into force. On the side of the United Kingdom, the pound stood at maximum 6 months against the euro thanks to the expectations, currently at 70%, of victory of the Conservative Party, anticipating a Brexit agreement.

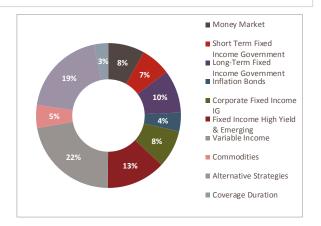

The month of November accelerates the optimistic tone in macroeconomic references. The US economy grew at an annual rate of 2.1% in the third quarter, two tenths more than previously calculated, and one tenth above the rise recorded in the previous quarter. Strong PMI data in Europe and China accompanied, both providing expansive results and with China registering strong rebounds in both the indicators of manufacturing and services (50.2 and 54.4 respectively). Highlight the unemployment data in the Eurozone, maintaining robust behavior and leaving the O ctober figure at 7.5% from 7.6% in the previous month.

During the month of November we had the premiere of Christine Lagarde at the head of the ECB's monetary policy. Lagarde took advantage of a banking conference in Frankfurt to vindicate the important weight attributed to the role of fiscal policy in improving the competitiveness and internal demand of the countries. The Fed continues to show a prudent tone and no news were highlighted regarding the messages from previous meetings. The latest expansive data of the US economy continue to anticipate a rather accommodative monetary policy, at least in the short term. Thus, the possibility of further increases in interest rates seems to get far away.

In fixed income markets, the month of November left a slight rebound in the IRRs of the American curve, especially in the medium and long sections. In the United Kingdom, the expectation of a positive output in the impending elections regarding the agreement with the European Union has mitigated the volatility of the curve from last October. For European curves, the increases in IRRs are not concentrated in any specific period. Finally, the American and European credit recorded general increases of 0.33% and 0.22% respectively during the month of November, where the long sections carried out the greatest increases.
